By Gifford Pinchot, Milford, Pa.

For the last decade and more the essential fact about the forest situation in America has been winked at or overlooked in most public discussions of the subject. This fact is that our forests are disappearing at a rate that involves most serious danger to the future prosperity of our country, and that little or nothing that counts is being done about it.

That counts is 822,000,000 acres of virgin forest, of which only one-eighth remains. Half of that remaining eighth, roughly speaking, is held by the Government and is safe from devastation. The rest is being cut and burned with terrible speed. And there is nowhere in the world anything like a sufficient supply of timber of the kind we use to take the place of what we have destroyed.

The foregoing statement is taken from the introduction to a pamphlet by Major George P. Ahern, entitled "Devastated America." Major Ahern established the Philippine Forest Service, organized the protection and utilization of forty million acres of public timberlands, and not only laid the basis for a perpetual succession of timber crops, but earned cash enough to pay all the expenses of administration, all the expenses of the Philippine Forest School (which he founded), and four million dollars to last for the public treasury.

This outstanding success in forest conservation in the Philippines was built on Government control of the lumber trade. It has always been the foundation of such success throughout the world. And

Next morning, in the middle of the forenoon, he made his appearance at the Bacon place and asked if there was any work he could do for a feed.

"Yes," said Phil, who always lends a sympathetic ear to a man who is down and out, "There's three cords of wood cut up in the yard, just been sawed. Split it and he wood up and pile it in the shed and I will give you $5.00."

"All right," he said, and at the wood he went. It was 11 o'clock, and at 3 p. m. the wood was all split and piled in the shed. He was given the $5.00 as well as his dinner and supper.

The program was in charge of Miss Baker, the teacher. It was exceptionally fine and enjoyed by all the parents and friends who filled the schoolhouse. The party was so successful that the children took part in one of the little dialogues and fill the stockings and stayed for the entertainment and when called on for a speech, he said that was the best program he had heard for a long time and the girls were awarded prizes for the best tree that awaited distribution of gifts. Many jokes were passed from his lips as he passed out the presents wrapped so daintily. He made all the presents with tinest toys and candies. He wanted him to come and share his bed with Santa and he would come to his house and stay till Christmas Day, but Santa was a very shy person and had to go elsewhere that night.

Every child had a part in the program. Alfred White and Alfred Lovejoy and Morris Parker received skis, man-sized skis too, from the Kiwanis Club, through Mr. Allen. Does all the money go?"

Henshaw was almost in tears. She had been Blair something about her failure to "get a head."

"The money go?" she asked hopelessly.

"Want me to tell you, dear?" Mrs. Blair replied, "with the advice of mature experience."

"Other young people," she continued, "you and I have broke"—as you say—"because you have no systematic buying plan. You need to adopt a budget! Study your problem—know exactly what you must have and buy accordingly."

"The big test! Do you know how to buy—what to buy, when, and where? You simply must learn, and, that's the way the world is to study the advertisements in the papers. Read the ads carefully; apply their suggestions to your needs, and you will save money! I know, for twenty years I have done so."

Public Men I Have Known

Major David R. Hastings Model Jury Advocate—A Prominent Citizen of Lovell and Fryeburg

Article 7, by O. F. Whitman

It is well understood, I hope, that I am not writing these sketches to please anybody; to gloss over anyone's failings or to give a coloring where the naked fact would not justify it. I am writing a pride in the belief that I have established a reputation for sincerity and truth.

The files of the Advertiser are being preserved and they furnish the best history of the town and this section of Maine, which could be written, and I am mindful that sometime when I am not here, the local historian and the curious may come across some of these sketches, and if they do, I trust they will feel the force of the sincerity in which it has been the endeavor to clothe them, for they express my honest judgment and convictions of the men I have known.

Major David R. Hastings died at the age of seventy-two, the latter part of the month in which I became Clerk of the Courts in 1895, but I had often seen him in the management of cases in court, which he was interested and he impressed me as being the model jury advocate among the lawyers I have ever known. He had nothing of the spectacular, spread eagle style of address about him. He did not "talk to the galleries" or to please the spectators with witty sarcasm, but every sentence was uttered with effect and had its weight with judge and jury. After a case was given into his hands it was managed to suit himself to be won, if such a thing was possible.

Some lawyers have a way of padding their entries in court, that is, bringing suits that are never expected to be tried, or worth while, but they help to swell the number of entries on the docket and have the tendency to show that the attorney has a large practice.

Major David R. Hastings resorted to no such ways of doing business. I have reason to believe that he despised all that kind of law practice.

Two cases that he tried, which came under my notice remain fresh in memory. They will illustrate his methods. One was a criminal action in which he was counsel for the defendant. The other was a suit for damages, where he was attorney for the plaintiff.

The first one was an indictment for a criminal assault on a young woman against a young man. The parties lived in Fryeburg or vicinity. Major Hastings was convinced that it was a put up job, but the question was to convince the jury of that fact. There were only two witnesses the parties interested, and in such circumstances the sympathy of the juryman is almost invariably with the woman in the case.

Major Hastings had served three years in county prison—having succeeded Charles W. Walton in 1893. He knew exactly what he was up against and he could depend upon what he could get out of the woman on cross examination. She made a good appearance in testimony on the witness stand and told us a straightforward story and was so modest about it that it seemed that the Major's case was irretrievably lost. The county attorney felt absolutely sure that the defendant was as good as convicted. He now began the fine work of the skillful hammer. Did he go at the woman "with hammer and tongs" and browbeat her like some attorneys? Oh, no. He had her so he would have put her on her guard and to one, probably lost his case. He began his questioning in a very quiet way and she was soon put at rest in her mind that he wanted to do her no harm. He contradicted the story she had told. After a time he asked her what she said to the men, who were at work on the road when she first saw anyone after they came out of the lonely road on which they had been riding that she had testified about into the highway. She answered that she said nothing to them. Then he asked her what she said to the young man when he left her at her home. She answered that she invited him to call and see a new carriage the family had recently purchased. By these answers the county attorney's case was lost beyond recovery and the defendant soon was discharged and left the court room a free man, thanks to the skillful cross examination of Major Hastings.

In the other suit every point necessary to prove the allegations in the writ was clearly established by competent evidence, notwithstanding the great efforts of the opposing counsel to discredit it. Extraneous matters, which had no bearing upon the questions at issue received no attention from the able counsel for the plaintiff, but with bull dog tenacity he fixed his grip upon those which had a controlling influence and could not be shaken. Coming to the question of damages he did not ask for such an amount as might be considered excessive, which would give the opposite counsel an opportunity to carry the action to the full court, where the damages would be almost certain to be pared down, entailing large cost and expense to his client, and which unlike some lawyers, he always wished to avoid. He therefore sought for only reasonable damages and argued along that line. The verdict he obtained was perfectly satisfactory to him and it stood unshaken.

In him I could see what a judge on the bench of our highest court should be—learned in the principles of jurisprudence, with the greatest judgment, fair mindedness; great patience in sifting out truth from error; and a love of right and justice. He was eminently fitted to shine as Chief Justice of the Supreme Judicial Court of Maine.

David Robinson Hastings came of a noble line of English ancestry running back for over a thousand years. He was born in Bethel, August 28, 1856, and died January 23, 1928. He graduated at Bowdoin in 1884. He chose the law for his profession and after his admission to the bar he settled at Lovell village and soon rose to prominence and became one of the leaders of his party in the county and state. Later he was its controlling influence for many years.

On the breaking out of the Civil War he took a stand in favor of maintaining the Union and did great service in organizing the War Democracy of the State. But for the support of such men as David Robinson Hastings throughout the north, the Rebellion could not have been put down. All honor to them while the country endures.

When the 12th Maine Regt. was organized Wm. E. Kimball was organized as county attorney and clerk of the courts, and was a Democrat, was commissioned as Lieut. Colonel and David R. Hastings was Major. Kimball rose to the command of his regiment and was compelled to resign on account of ill health and his relative, Capt. Osmond A. Hastings of the Bethel Company, another Democrat, was promoted to Major.

In 1864 Major Hastings removed from Lovell village to Fryeburg village, which he made his home for thirty years, to his death. As the Reporter of Decisions of the Supreme Judicial Court, he published volumes 69 and 70 of the Maine Reports.

Besides his law practice he engaged in the lumber business, and was very large property. He died unrepentant. In the old cemetery at Fryeburg, where Gen. Joseph Frye, for whom the town was named, has a very unpretentious stone to mark his grave, the last resting place of Major David R. Hastings, is marked by a lofty monument, emblematic of his patriotism and character.

Slow Drivers Road Hogs.

From N. Y. Times, New York

Although the first snow hailed into court for "small driving" has been acquitted, it is hoped that the police will not give up their attempt to check this particular form of traffic obstruction.

The men and women who drive so slowly that traffic piles up behind them, and who, as is often the case, fail to keep to the extreme right of the road, are among the chief causes of congestion.

In San Francisco and various Western cities the police are constantly on the watch to speed up these "snail drivers."

We are still too slow to allow that side streets are blocked by signals, or by the "boulevard stop" system, which requires all cars to make a complete stop before turning into or crossing a main thoroughfare, fast driving—within the maximum speed limit—implies no additional dangers.

It is hard for the human mind to adjust itself to the safety of speed. When the slowest of the first snowed people ridiculed the idea of a train traveling thirty miles an hour and insisted that no man could live going at such a speed. We are still too close to the horse age to understand the wisdom of a policy which puts a penalty on unduly slow driving.

Don't Let That Cold Turn Into "Flu"

That cold may turn into "Flu," Grippe, even worse, Pneumonia, unless you take care of it at once. Rub Musterole on the congested parts and see how quickly it brings relief as effectively as the messy old mustard plaster.

Musterole, made from pure oil of mustard, camphor, menthol and other simple ingredients, is a counter-irritant which stimulates circulation and helps break up the cold.

You will feel a warm tingling as it enters the pores, then a cooling sensation that brings welcome relief.

WHAT CONSTITUTES A GOOD WATCH?

Although a dependable watch is such a vital necessity in these speedy days when time means money that everybody is less generally understood or appreciated than that of a motor car or aeroplane. Only infants, apparently, are interested in what makes the wheels go round; the average adult takes the watch in his vest pocket for granted.

"How many jewels has it?" is the only question which seems to worry the purchaser. After buying a really good watch, the case or the bracelet that goes with it captures his complete attention. Thus, some unscrupulous dealers can get pocket watches than they are worth by dwelling upon the fine rubies concealed in their interiors.

As a matter of fact, the importance of many jewels in a watch is vastly overestimated by the public. Any reputable jeweler will tell you that a poorly adjusted watch with 21 jewels is much inferior to a 17-jewel watch which has been carefully adjusted, and many very good watches contain less. It has only been within recent years that any American watch could boast more than 15, which was considered quite sufficient. At present the largest number of jewels contained in any watch is 23 and the smallest number in a watch considered to be jeweled is 7. A watch selling for less than $5 usually has no jewels at all.

Diamonds, sapphires, rubies and garnets are used for the jewels, and they are by no means expensive. So you can see that much more important things enter into the making of a good watch than the jewels, which merely lessen the friction and aid the regularity of the movement.

Altogether there are between 150 and 200 individual parts in a modern watch, containing each its screw. Gold, steel, brass, nickel alloy and aluminum bronze are deftly combined so as to secure exactly the right weight and resiliency for each part. Special machines have been constructed for the making of each type of watch movement, watch produces the parts with mathematical precision, and since machinery is always more accurate than the human hand, the modern watch is vastly more efficient timekeeper than the one worn by your grandfather, which was put together by hand.

One of the many improvements is the ability of the modern watch to keep on running smoothly through sudden changes of climate. A rise in temperature always has its effect upon a watch, causing the oil to become thinner and the friction different. Some of the parts expand and the mainspring has less resistance. A sudden frost will produce an effect exactly opposite. This change is around this difficulty through the use of certain impervious metals, so that now you can take your watch out of a steam-heated house into a blizzard without having it lose the fraction of a second.

A modern watch also has considerably more power than any of its predecessors, because it is adjusted to changes of position—five of them. These are: flat, on edge, with the stem up; on edge, stem to the right, and on edge, stem to the left. A few are also specially adjusted to keep good time standing on their heads.

Tricks in the Dog Trade

Buying and Selling Dogs With Care—
Things That Lead and Mislead

By Emerson P. Bartlett of East Sumner

The things of interest, in any trade or business line, are the ways a person can depart from legitimate methods and go to do business with the public. My experience in buying dogs from some of the larger kennels has proven to me some of the things I am about to tell.

Now brother sportsman, I am not writing these few lines to hurt any honest dealer's business at all, for there are people engaged in breeding, raising, training, trading, buying and selling dogs of every known breed, size, color, and for every known purpose that are perfectly honest, and will give you a square deal in every way, as far as they know.

Very well we know that the sporting magazines, especially those along the lines of hunting and all outdoor recreation are well patronized with dog advertising matter.

At the same time, the editors of these magazines are not to blame if the reader does business with one of his advertisers, for they receive the ad to be published in good faith, and they have no way to know which to select the good from the bad. So if a customer gets "stung", the editor might shed a few tears, make a couple of turns in his swivel chair, say to himself, the advertising columns are strong features in the magazine business.

The writer has made a study of the dog advertising columns for a great many years and could recite many pages from memory.

Some read like this, FOR SALE—coon dog, all night hunter, very best of nose, open traffic, wonderful bar tree qualities, all ready to put to work, owner obliged to sell on account of poor health. This ad looks pretty good, does it not?

I once felt a victim for one of these long distance dog sales, as well as quite a number of my hunting pals, who have suffered financial losses along the same avenues, and worse yet, almost wicked disappointment, when the hunting season was close at hand, and the dealer of the fox and coon hunter was running high.

Now when sending your check, and in return, receive a well crated, good pointed, good looking fox or coon dog, along with some rural life, where fox and coon hunting seems to predominate as a pastime.

Your neighbors seem as interested in the arrival of the goods as does the one who sent the check. However, you pay the express agent the transportation charges, ranging from two dollars to six, according to distance.

You light a good cigar, very carefully put the crate into the old porch, express wagon or perhaps a tin Lizzie, just a matter of which you consider a careful choice as to safety. In either case, call for your dog, and you are home.

Now a few years ago I wrote Mr. C. B. Landis of Pennsylvania for the price on a three year old fox hound, well trained, that he had and would guarantee, a good fox dog and positively deer and rabbit proof.

Mr. Landis answered my request in haste, and sending me a very attractive list of dogs that he had to offer, that he would recommend to hunt any kind of game, from a nursing mouse to a full grown elephant.

It was late in October and the fox season close at hand, Harold Spaulding, an old hunting pard of mine wanted to go fifty-fifty on this dog as we were going to hunt quite a lot together that season, and we needed another dog to add to my pack.

We selected an especially well recommended three year old hound, upon ten days trial, waited six days and not a word.

I wrote Mr. Landis in regard to the shipment, in due time received an answer saying that he had been very busy, but he would certainly ship the dog the following morning.

Four days later the dog arrived at our station in an old dry goods box, after we had sent one dollar extra for a comfortable crate, as per Mr. Landis's request.

Nevertheless the old box contained a good looking, good shaped, tan colored hound that looked well up to our expectations.

We reached home about dark that evening, took him from the old box, rubbed him down in the best of shape, gave him a good supper, walked him on the chain for five minutes, and took him to the kennel for the night.

Early next morning I walked him on the chain for about one mile, then gave him a good breakfast, then let him lay around and rest the remainder of the day.

Mister, the following morning there was a heavy white frost, which is always so graciously desired by all fox hunters. And mighty early Harold and myself were on our way down the gravel road for our happy hunting grounds, with the new dog and Max, the best dog in my pack, on the chains.

About one-half mile out, we left the county road, swinging off to the left, hand, going up under the shadows of Old Long Mountain. There was a narrow strip of heavy swamp to go through before we reached the high land near the mountain.

Harold says to me, "Let's cut the dogs loose and see what the new dog will do." One minute after they had their freedom, we saw a large rabbit hopping along. "Let him have it," said Harold, "and we will soon find out if we have got a rabbit dog here." I threw in a light shell and pulled on the bunny, and you ought to have seen the new dog coming down over the ledges.

Was he a rabbit dog? No, he was gun shy, worse yet. He came close to us with his tail between his legs and all of a tremble, and not another step would he move away from us.

Seeing he believes, yes, we could see the dog crotch, though he was a check was many miles away. For a gun shy dog is very poor property indeed, ask some old hunter who has had experience along these lines.

Putting him back on the chain, I started for home. It was no question, he was not worth what we paid for the old box that we took him from.

Just as I was starting out, Max struck a warm foot, and was driving right along by note, Harold joined his company in haste, and before I reached home, two shots echoed from Harold's repeater and I knew what had happened for he is one of the best shots in the business, and in less than an hour, he, Max and Red, were in the house.

Of course we wanted to give the dog another chance, and that afternoon we took him out alone, let him off the chain, and we singled out pretty wide and in a little while I fired a shot and Mr. Dog came in as quick as if he had been in a tree close overhead and our second trial was over.

Next morning when the nine o'clock train pulled out of East Sumner our worthless pup was a canine passenger.

I also wrote Mr. Landis my reason for returning same, and that I was trusting to his honesty in shipping us a better specimen in exchange.

Six days had rolled along, when Dog No. 2 arrived at our station. While our order and check called for a coon dog, we received a foxhound, yet this dog was of yellow color with the exception of a white strip in face, very large, bony head, large heavy tail and large legs, we decided that he was a fifty-fifty St. Bernard foxhound cross, and at that, a very poor specimen.

That night there came a couple of inches of good moist snow, and in the morning I started Harold off very early with No. 2, twenty minutes out they came upon a fox track that was so fresh that it was almost smoking, taking the dog's collar off, Harold worked hard for nearly an hour trying to put the St. Bernard down the line upon Reynard's warm trail, but all in vain.

"That's all over a few words from the back pages of the book, also a kind word for the poor dog, brought his tongue to his shoulder and blew the mongrel's head off right there in the tall timber."

My word, that was some advertisement for that dealer, as I wrote a long story on that business transaction, it was published in a magazine of wide circulation, and I received a number of congratulating letters from popular sportsmen living in three different states.

Now the very next hunting season I was in the market for another dog, a night hunter or in other words a coon dog.

At that time I was a constant reader of the best paper, in my mind, that was ever published in this country, along the lines of hunting, fishing and trapping, throughout our good old state of Maine, which was "The Maine Woods," published by F. V. Brackett Company, at Phillips, Maine. Proud to say that I contributed to its columns for more than ten years.

Early that autumn there appeared in the ad column of this paper, a partial description of a pack of seven hunting dogs that Mr. H. A. Thayer of Cherryfield, Maine was advertising for sale, and in less than a week I had done business with Mr. Thayer.

Just a moment while I tell you upon arrival of this pup I certainly thought that I was stung again, for when I got to the depot there was a bunch hanging around the crate upon the platform, and the crate was marked in large letters "Bear Dog, Look Out!" and no one would touch the meaning of those words for upon touching the crate this dog was as ferocious as any lion.

Listen, when I got home, it took me nearly an hour to remove the contents of that package.

Mr. Thayer told me that he was strictly a one man dog, at the same time I did not expect that he was wild. I fastened a snap to a stick and after a long time I succeeded in connecting it to the ring upon his collar, then taking the stick from the box, I delivered the goods and we soon got acquainted.

Copy of letter from Mr. Thayer to Maine Woods.

Cherryfield, Aug. 14, 1909.
Editor of "Maine Woods," Phillips, Maine.

"Thinking perhaps it might be of interest to you, as it was through an advertisement in your paper that I got in communication with Emerson P. Bartlett, of East Sumner, Maine, to whom I sold a bear dog from a pack that I have been a number of years getting together, this dog is one of the pick of my pack, he is an Indian mongrel and has a record of three bears handled without the help of other dogs."

I have used airedale terriers, blood and foxhound crosses and they are all right, and I have some of the best in America, but this dog picked up in the Provinces from a half breed Indian turned out to be all the breed claimed for him.

And for all round dog to hunt wild cats, coon, lynx and bear, I have never seen his equal.

Yours respectfully,
H. A. Thayer.

As I mentioned above I bought this dog to use upon coon, and I certainly found him to be the best I ever wanted for that purpose, he was an all night hunter, no matter what the going, or what the weather was, he was about half way between an open and a silent trailer. He had the best nose of any cross breed dog I ever saw, extra bark tree, and a wicked killer. I paid a long price for him, and it was the best buy that I ever made.

I hunted with him two seasons and he paid for himself each season.

A neighbor of mine once had a hound that he had trained for the purpose of hunting rabbits only, this dog was the genuine article my friend hunted with his three seasons and he certainly reaped a harvest.

At the close of the third season he refused an offer of seventy dollars for the dog. This man was a good hunter as well as his dog, who had proved faithful and was strictly fox and deer proof, consequently what seemed to be a liberal offer was refused.

Now listen, the second time out the following season this dog picked up a fresh deer track and got interested right away and down the trail he went. His master gave him another trial a couple of days later, but it was of no use. He was a deer hound from the first that he followed, and never again would he take any interest in rabbits.

Did the man kill his dog?—the animal which had served him so well in the past three seasons. In all kinds of weather, upon frozen ground, over deep snow when a hunter experienced difficulty on snowshoes, where the dog had to make twenty miles to his master's one. And then he had shot five hundred rabbits ahead of this same dog—no, the next morning he put him into a crate and shipped him to—well, I must not tell you the man's name, but he is a dealer in a nearby city.

On the same train also went a letter which read as follows:

Dear Mr. M.: It is with regret that I am sending you under separate cover what I honestly believe to be the best deer hound that was ever put into a crate upon arrival of this pup, if you feel disposed, you may forward check for five cents and all is quiet.

In reply: "Brother sportsman, your shipment at hand am remitting by check this morning, this dog is just what I have been get hold of for a long time, that I may get back a party whom I did business with last season."

Three days later the dealer had the dog placed with the party he had in mind, and the price was thirty-five dollars. The first morning out the pup went right along as a good deer hound and a game warden shot him right in sight of the new owner.

This is only one instance, though it is an example of how a great many worthless dogs get into circulation, for quite a lot after they go wrong. Some of them do not describe the faults their canine possessors. There are some dealers who do not require a description as to size, color, disposition, fighting weight, or a dozen or more habits that occasionally show up in different breeds of hunting dogs.

Very few honest dealers get loaded up with the class of dogs mentioned above, though once in a while they do get stung, and sometimes they ship out one of them, though perfectly innocent as to his habits, and when the mistake is noticed, an honest dealer will see you through all right. Although let me tell you that through my many years of experience in buying hunting dogs from dealers as well as hunters, to look before you leap, or in other words study the situation very carefully, for there are many of those queens in their class that after a while went wrong and were hustled away to the markets.

Here is another one that always kept a pack of from three to six hunting dogs including coon, fox, skunk, rabbit, and partridge dogs, now one particular item that I have in mind was a one year old fox hound, that he paid forty dollars for, and returned at that price the dog was in very easy that fall with an old ad and best dog in the pack next season he hunted them together and pretty hard, too, and the young dog turned out to be a real wonder and even wanted to buy him, but nothing doing, a very needed him in his business, and when the next hunting season rolled along he was the proud possessor of the best pack of fox hounds for many miles around. That winter with the good work of those dogs, together with experienced help he had the gun they brought in red fox pelts enough to cover a small canoe.

Well, when that good and happy hunting season was over and the good warm spring weather was at hand, this remarkable young hound began to have fits and very bad ones too, and his master asked me to shoot the dog for him, but as for that he might have been living yet.

Now comes the funny part, one day following the worse attack the dog ever had that lasted for an hour, a Massachusetts party upon their way home from a fishing trip in the Rangleys, drove into the man's yard, and at first sight the dog attracted their attention very much, asking for a price on him, the owner told them that he was the best dog in the pack and he did not care to sell him at any price, yet he kept dwelling along on a lot of dog pertaining to the dog his illness, describing many good points the dog possessed, and that it would be a matter to shoot a couple hundred dollars worth of foxes ahead of him that coming winter.

However, they were out for a dog and they seemed to be overburdened with the exchange of goods which they wanted to exchange with a foxhound from the State of Maine.

Of course this man did not want to hold the Sportsman too long, fearing the pup would be overcome with a bad fit at a moment's notice. So he asked them if they would sign a paper that they would carry the dog out of the State, that they would take forty dollars for him, this offer was accepted, and the dog was taken out of the State, and all parties concerned were happy. My neighbor still has the writing and would like to know if the dog lived until they got home. Many a good laugh there has been over that deal.

Here is another habit that has caused many a night hunting dog that cost their owner good money to become worthless almost automatically, this habit is in the dog mixing up with hedgehogs, and when I think of hedgehogs I think of Airedale dogs as well, for I had two many years ago that I used upon coon for two whole seasons, they were extra good at the coon business, and they were easily worth a hundred dollars each, but all at once they took up the quill pig habit. Any time you could see a live hedgehog with a Airedale stunk and a live hedgehog with a Airedale stunk of each other, and ninety-nine times out of one hundred they would choose the pig even if they had not tasted food for twenty-four hours, and the only thing that will break an Airedale's habit is a charge of shot between the eyes and that is what happened to those two dogs.

Some might of said place them in some kennel at a reduced price, Airedale I supposed to be shipped to some jockeyed back and forth over the railroads and to be kicked around.

In these days I was traveling the mountain peaks and four nights per week throughout the hunting season, and I needed their room for more dogs, so I could say why not be patriotic and patronize home industry and buy your hunting dogs of your neighbor.

That would be starting something, just imagine your neighbor who of course is a good hunter, for if he were not he would not have good hunting dogs on hand.

Let me tell you, my friend, that there is extremely warm competition between these neighbors each evening themselves to their limit in trying to bring in more fox and coon pelts than the other fellow, even if you buy a dog from him you would have to put down a long price, and there are many reasons why there are not many of these dog trades carried on among neighbors, the most simple one is that your new purchase is not to work in the woods, but often when the day's hunt is over the new dog would return to his former home. I have known cases where the whole pack was sooner or later led astray, and it is not very pleasant to drive five or six miles west morning following a long, hard day's hunt in picking up your pack of dogs.

Many times I have been asked the question what does a good fox or coon hound cost, one might as well ask what does an automobile cost. Now the easiest way is to refer the party seeking information to the columns in the advertising section of the best sporting magazine. Should they tell you they have none at hand, simply tell them that some of the hunting puppies at four weeks old can be bought for five dollars each, and ranging from that price up, some of the best dogs cost one hundred dollars and even more.

Mature dogs partly trained from twenty-five dollars to fifty, with the best quality up to five or six hundred dollars each, while the breeding fee of some of these dogs are quoted anywhere from fifteen dollars up to as high as some of the best and in some cases even more.

Hats off to a Man's true friend, the dog.

INFLUENZA IN MAINE
The influenza epidemic in Maine is of moderate severity at the present time, so states the State Commissioner of Health.

He also reports that the number of cases in Maine reported to the department this month is 146, and the total number of cases reported in the State since August is about 200. There have been several deaths from the disease, probably about 50. Deaths numbering 394 were reported from August to the first of November, but the reports for November are not yet in.

The cases in influenza in the State are scattered, but the largest number reported in one locality is in the town of Danforth in Washington county where there were 25 cases.

While the epidemic in Maine is not of sufficient proportions to cause worry at the present time, the people should be careful and take precautions to prevent the further spread of the disease, said Dr. Kendall. He pointed out that the disease may be spread by infected eating and drinking utensils; by the droplets sprayed into the air by infected persons; by finger-borne infection, and by towels, handkerchiefs and other articles.

Personal safeguards include: Staying at home as much as possible when the grip is prevalent; walking as much as possible; avoiding visits to persons showing symptoms of cold or grip; the scalding of eating and drinking utensils; keeping the hands away from the nose and mouth and washing the hands carefully before meals.

NORWAY LAKE

Early in the week of December 17, very attractive invitations were received by parents and friends for a Christmas party given by the pupils of the Norway Lake School to be held Friday afternoon, which was the last day of the Fall term of the school. A very interesting program of music and recitations was furnished by the pupils, and the pupils were very much interested in the children and the teacher, Mrs. Truitt, from the well laden Christmas tree.

Roy Ingalls motored to Bradford, Vt., Christmas with his mother. The Norway Lake Mothers' Club will hold their anniversary supper, Thursday night, January 3, and will be followed by a dance. The supper will consist of cold meats, mashed potatoes, hot rolls, pastry, etc.

Clarence Dunham and family were dinner guests at the Flood home, Tuesday. Mrs. Mary Healy of Portland is a guest of her son, Henry Healy and family.
